Good Investment Advice Only for the Rich, National Survey

More Than One in Four (26 percent) Believes $100,000 needed for Top-Quality Financial Advice

CINCINNATI, OH – Nearly two-thirds (65 percent) of investing Americans believe that those with more money are able to get better financial advice than those with less money. Further, more than a quarter (26 percent) state that it takes at least $100,000 to get top-quality financial advice.

This according to a new survey by the Retirement Corporation of America, which also finds that more than half (56 percent) of investors believe that financial advisors lose credibility when they accept fees or commissions for the investment funds they sell. In addition, nearly the same numbers believe that financial advisers just sell those funds on which they can make the maximum commission.

Given the above perceptions, it is not surprising that 53 percent rely on themselves or turn to family and friends when it is time to make investment decisions rather than seek professional advice.

However, changing investment funds is easier said than done for investors. The survey finds that nearly a third (31 percent) are willing to wait from one to five years before they move their money from a poorly performing option to a better one. The factor that makes it most difficult for investors when they are contemplating change is the scarcity of time to conduct adequate research as cited by a third (33 percent). This is followed by 20 percent who state that they are confused by all the available options and 16 percent who are afraid of making the wrong decisions.

“There are more than 8,000 mutual fund managers and the majority produce investment results that are below average,” said Daniel Kiley, chairman and chief compliance officer of the Retirement Corporation of America. “This means millions of Americans are paying good money for poor performance. It simply doesn’t make sense. And it doesn’t have to be this way. With our newly launched Money Masters Investment Portfolios™, we are taking the guess work out of investing in mutual funds and making it easy for investors who seek to optimize the performance of their assets -- in up and down markets,” he said.

The Retirement Corporation of America conducted this survey to better understand why consumers stay invested in mutual funds delivering poor performance. Their newly launched investment opportunity – Money Masters Investment Portfolios – is the first to offer unbiased advice and access to top-performing investment funds for every American.

More information about the Retirement Corporation of America’s national investment survey is available at www.moneymasters.com. The survey is based on a national phone poll of 1,000 U.S. investors conducted May 15-16, 2006 and was compiled by Rasmussen Reports, LLC, an independent research firm (www.RasmussenReports.com). The margin of sampling error for a survey based on this number of interviews is approximately +/-3 percent with a 95 percent level of confidence.

About the Retirement Corporation of America

The Retirement Corporation of America, a Registered Investment Advisory firm based in Cincinnati, Ohio, was founded by Dan Kiley to liberate the average investor from the troubles of poorly handled money. Through its newly launched “R” Account™, the Retirement Corporation of America offers Money Masters Investment Portfolios—a personally tailored and risk-adjusted online investment portfolio containing the top 10 stock fund managers and top 5 bond fund managers, as determined by the company’s strict selection criteria. The portfolio is available to every American with no minimum account balance, no commissions, no transaction fees and no exit penalties, just a modest annual investment management fee of one percent (or less) of the client’s account balance and an account set-up fee. The company was created by three partners—Retirement Capital Advisors, a Registered Investment Advisory with a 20-year track record of providing individuals investment advice; Diligent Partners, a strategic and technology consulting firm for the financial services industry; and the Professional Education Institute, an educational and training firm with significant experience helping consumers set financial goals. The Retirement Corporation of America has chosen Fidelity as the third-party custodian, responsible for holding all assets, executing trades as directed, and providing ongoing reports.
